Dear Director Haveman,

Madison House Autism Foundation has been made aware of a letter dated September 3, 2013 from eight Michigan organizations for people with disabilities that expresses concern about the building of new group homes, the colocation of group homes, proposals for disability specific campuses with group homes, etc. We would like to provide a different perspective in concert with the organizations that have signed this letter.

In April 2013, more than 20 national experts serving those with autism and other intellectual/developmental disabilities (I/DD) met in roundtable forum, Spectrum of Possibilities: Decreasing Barriers, Increasing Options, to consider housing options. Parents, autistic adults and others with I/DD are developing public-private partnerships to create local solutions that fit their specific support needs and wishes. Now, however, policy developed to protect and empower those with I/DD is creating barriers to appropriate housing.

Each person is entitled to the most integrated setting for that person's needs, determined on a case-by-case basis. Many autistic adults and others with I/DD who are in need of support services are adversely affected by the unstructured settings that may be isolating and have too little assistance, structure, and/or supervision and are thus detrimental to the individual. In sharp contrast, an article is enclosed featuring a community festival in support of Benjamin's Hope, one of the very residential homes for autistic adults that Mr. Hoyle describes as segregated and isolating. Hundreds of community supporters attended the event, including "those . . . who shared [a] vision for a campus where the developmentally disabled would feel as comfortable as those without and were driven to help" (Holland Sentinel, Sept. 12, 2013).

1. We understand that the Olmstead v. L.C. decision protects against involuntary placements and upholds one's right to choice of residential placement, support services, and community. Yet, this important ruling is misinterpreted when used to exclude or limit residential options in cases where residents with I/DD voluntarily choose to live with self-determined lifestyles and desired support services or when used to exclude any residential setting modeled after communities.

2. We believe that any definition of “home” and/or “community,” which excludes specific settings, proximity of residences, limits number of residents with I/DD, etc. should be recognized as discrimination. An individual with I/DD has the right to choose a home and community appropriate to his or her support needs, a right which is given to the general population.

The number of people with autism and others with I/DD without residential programs is unprecedented and growing. Ideologically forced integration of individuals without regard to needs and preferences is inconsistent with the needs of the autistic community and other individuals with I/DD. More significantly, restricting choice violates the letter and intent of the Olmstead decision. We strongly urge you not to implement any policy that would create barriers to innovative housing models, discriminate against and limit individual choice, and/or further restrict already scarce residential opportunities and limited resources.

We would be happy to discuss our concerns and views with you and/or provide detailed information.

Sincerely yours,

JaLynn Prince, President and Co-Founder
